

Top 3 Considerations for the Future of Work

How do you prepare your enterprise and workforce for the future when the future is uncertain? Simple, start here.

3

Assess your HR's digital maturity.

Technology investments don't always equal digital maturity. Intelligently connected technology is the key. It moves businesses from having data (to see what's happened) to using data (to affect the future). That makes organizations more agile and better able to respond to change, challenges and new opportunities—faster than ever before possible.

Have (and keep) a modern mindset.

We're past the point of returning to pre-pandemic "normal." Work is different now and will continue evolving. So...best to embrace and maximize it. Today's workforce-management technology has gotten really good at increasing flexibility, and elevating collaboration and engagement, regardless of location. The icing on the cake is that today's people platforms also streamline processes—actively driving efficiency, productivity and profits.

Prioritize employee experience (EX).

It pays. Research shows that businesses that invest in EX have two times the revenue and 25% smaller workforces than companies that don't emphasize EX. Employees love the self-serve independence of accessing paystubs and electing benefits digitally to getting supervisor feedback virtually and giving their own input via survey tools. (No wonder 92 percent of HR leaders are prioritizing EX this year.)

Don't be late to the future of work. We'll help you get there quickly.
